The Cadman-White-Handy House is in the Georgian style of architecture, which was very popular in the 1700s when it was built. This style was named after King George of England.

It is based on balance; also called symmetry. Symmetry is when certain parts of something look the same on either side of its middle. Basically, if you cut something in half, it will be the same on each side.

The drawing below shows what half of the Handy House looked like by 1790. Fill in the building details that are missing and then color it in. Is everything balanced?
